

We must break laws

Strategy Notes 253 and 254 said we should improve the balance of power between working people and owners. We can sometimes win small improvements using legal methods.

Because owners largely control the government, their laws only allow us small wins. We cannot win big, lasting changes in the balance of power just by legal means.

Consider a few examples:

- Sit-ins, sit-down strikes, and workplace occupations violate property-defending laws against trespass.
- Public employees will likely need to violate laws prohibiting them from striking.
- We cannot replace property and exchange with sharing and solidarity by acting only within the limits of property law.
- As they struggle to divide us, our opponents pass new laws attacking groups like LGBTQ people, people at risk of pregnancy, and people of color. Almost all the people they attack have to work for a living. To build unity among working people, we will likely need to violate such laws designed to divide us.
- As we grow stronger, we can expect our opponents to pass more laws to try to hinder our work.

Because our opponents currently make the laws, we cannot treat laws as holy idols that we must not violate.

We must break laws

Strategy Notes 253 and 254 said we should improve the balance of power between working people and owners. We can sometimes win small improvements using legal methods.

Because owners largely control the government, their laws only allow us small wins. We cannot win big, lasting changes in the balance of power just by legal means.

Consider a few examples:

- Sit-ins, sit-down strikes, and workplace occupations violate property-defending laws against trespass.
- Public employees will likely need to violate laws prohibiting them from striking.
- We cannot replace property and exchange with sharing and solidarity by acting only within the limits of property law.
- As they struggle to divide us, our opponents pass new laws attacking groups like LGBTQ people, people at risk of pregnancy, and people of color. Almost all the people they attack have to work for a living. To build unity among working people, we will likely need to violate such laws designed to divide us.
- As we grow stronger, we can expect our opponents to pass more laws to try to hinder our work.

Because our opponents currently make the laws, we cannot treat laws as holy idols that we must not violate.

