

Replace our exchange-based assumptions

Strategy Note 273 said we need to replace our exchange-based assumptions with ones suiting our new relationships. How?

The experience of struggle changes us. We remake ourselves and our assumptions by waging the campaigns necessary to win the transition from exchange to solidarity.

So we mustn't win too quickly. We probably need at least a few years of transformational struggle, perhaps decades or generations. I see no current danger of winning too quickly.

We should win as quickly as we can. The resistance by exchange's lingering adherents will surely suffice to delay us enough and require enough struggle for our transformation to happen. In this way, their opposition helps us make the changes we need.

That transformational struggle has, of course, already begun.

By reading this Strategy Note, you help the transition happen. By talking about these ideas, you help it happen. By arguing against these ideas, you help it happen.

At the current stage of our transition, engaging with these ideas in any way --even in opposition-- helps them spread. People who oppose these ideas should completely ignore them for now. Which, of course, lets them spread quietly until opponents can no longer ignore them.

Replace our exchange-based assumptions

Strategy Note 273 said we need to replace our exchange-based assumptions with ones suiting our new relationships. How?

The experience of struggle changes us. We remake ourselves and our assumptions by waging the campaigns necessary to win the transition from exchange to solidarity.

So we mustn't win too quickly. We probably need at least a few years of transformational struggle, perhaps decades or generations. I see no current danger of winning too quickly.

We should win as quickly as we can. The resistance by exchange's lingering adherents will surely suffice to delay us enough and require enough struggle for our transformation to happen. In this way, their opposition helps us make the changes we need.

That transformational struggle has, of course, already begun.

By reading this Strategy Note, you help the transition happen. By talking about these ideas, you help it happen. By arguing against these ideas, you help it happen.

At the current stage of our transition, engaging with these ideas in any way --even in opposition-- helps them spread. People who oppose these ideas should completely ignore them for now. Which, of course, lets them spread quietly until opponents can no longer ignore them.

