

Organize locally and globally

Some of North Carolina's employers --especially manufacturing employers-- moved here to flee unions elsewhere. That history suggests that North Carolina --like any other locality in the world-- cannot by itself create full success for working people. If we try to, many employers will move to where they can exploit workers more thoroughly than we allow. Or they will prompt governments they control to attack us. We must build a worldwide movement to create good conditions for working people everywhere.

Our labor movement should simultaneously work for long-term, middle-term, and short-term goals. Our movement should simultaneously work locally and globally. Only building a worldwide exchange-free society will succeed in the long term.

Our short-term and middle-term work makes our long-term work possible. They also create the conditions necessary for our long-term success.

Individuals and organizations should specialize in whatever portion of our movement's work attracts them. But our movement as a whole needs to move all these types of work forward together. All of us should value and encourage work of all these types.

Organize locally and globally

Some of North Carolina's employers --especially manufacturing employers-- moved here to flee unions elsewhere. That history suggests that North Carolina --like any other locality in the world-- cannot by itself create full success for working people. If we try to, many employers will move to where they can exploit workers more thoroughly than we allow. Or they will prompt governments they control to attack us. We must build a worldwide movement to create good conditions for working people everywhere.

Our labor movement should simultaneously work for long-term, middle-term, and short-term goals. Our movement should simultaneously work locally and globally. Only building a worldwide exchange-free society will succeed in the long term.

Our short-term and middle-term work makes our long-term work possible. They also create the conditions necessary for our long-term success.

Individuals and organizations should specialize in whatever portion of our movement's work attracts them. But our movement as a whole needs to move all these types of work forward together. All of us should value and encourage work of all these types.

